

We Are Technical Analysts

1. As technical analysts, we keep it simple and see markets as either in a trend or sideways movement of consolidation or distribution. We are guided by four disciplines: (1) we buy against defined levels of support; (2) we buy breakouts beyond a key resistance. On the flip side, we (3) sell against defined levels of resistance and (4) sell breakdowns of key support. Whichever form of analysis your company uses to initiate a strategy, our technical approach teaches opportunity and, most importantly, the tool of timing!
2. We do not look at fundamentals to develop our strategies. As technical analysts, we know that fundamentals are always in the background but technical analysis is the distillation of all the information, just in price form.
3. A technical approach may develop into a long-term price movement, it depends on the strength of the signal. We react in the direction of the signal and try to stay with that signal until there is a reason to change.
4. One of the benefits of technical analysis is that it imposes very strict disciplines on when to enter and exit a strategy. This discipline eliminates the human tendency to cut profits short and let losses ride.
5. Looking at chart patterns and trends help us to design important option strategies that either protects a position and/or enhances a return!
